Overview and Objectives

This module will acquaint students with the main theoretical debates and empirical findings in the research on terrorism. It covers the topic from both a contemporary and an historical perspective and examines terrorism as a strategic tool of intra-state and transnational warfare. We will draw on insights from political science, sociology, psychology, criminology, economics, and history to shed light on such topics as the historical trends in terrorist activity, the relationship of terrorism to other forms of political violence, the use of one-sided violence in civil conflicts, the system and individual-level roots of terrorism, the role of religion in contemporary transnational terrorism, as well as the effects and effectiveness of this strategy of political violence. We will also examine the policy responses available to political decision makers in the field of security, including the ethical concerns arising in the context of counter-terrorist strategies.

Students will be asked to complete a comprehensive set of readings, to participate actively in seminar discussions, and to complete a long paper assignment. In addition to the required readings, the syllabus below provides an ample body of additional literature for each session and topic. These readings are not required for the course, but students are encouraged to draw on them to deepen their understanding of topics that are of particular interest to them.

By the end of the term, students should be equipped to answer central theoretical and practical questions, such as: why and when do organizations resort to terrorist strategies? Under what conditions are grievances and opportunities for terrorism most likely to emerge? How does violence spill across borders, and what drives transnational terrorism? What leads individuals to the point at which they feel that violence is their only option to bring about political change? How does terrorism affect politics and society in the target countries? How do terrorist organizations collapse, and what options do policymakers have to counter the threat of terrorism?

Please note that this module places emphasis on an empirical approach to the study of terrorism. Thus, the methodological discussions and exercises in the seminars aim to equip students with the analytical tools to ask theoretically relevant and empirically testable research questions, to generate hypotheses, and to develop empirical strategies to test these hypotheses.

Module Aims

1. To assist students in developing a conceptually and empirically informed understanding of the debates surrounding terrorist violence.
2. To qualify an international group of postgraduate students who may wish to proceed to further specialised study of terrorism and/or employment in fields related to counterterrorism, governance, business, politics, or media.
3. To develop the key skills needed to participate in group discussions about conceptual issues and theoretical debates related to terrorism and to write essays.
4. To develop the analytical and methodological skills necessary to formulate and answer theoretically and practically relevant research questions.

Module Objectives

By the end of the module students will have developed an understanding of the individual, organization, state/societal, and transnational causes of terrorism.

- They will be able to critically evaluate competing approaches to the analysis of terrorist violence and apply theory to reflect on and develop their own understanding of contemporary counterterrorism debates.
- They will have familiarized themselves with a number of case studies of historical and contemporary relevance to the study of terrorism.
- They will have gained the analytical and methodological skills to systematically analyse key issues associated with the causes and consequences of terrorism.

Module Format

The module consists of weekly lectures and seminars. The seminars will provide an occasion to deepen the understanding of the material presented in lectures through a variety of activities. All students are encouraged to participate actively in the seminars through group discussion and tasks.

Assessment

This module is assessed by a 3,000 word essay. The essay is a research paper on a topic relevant to terrorism or counterterrorism. Please see the dedicated document as well as the SPP Student Handbook and the SPP Student Intranet for further information.

Classroom Policy

We aim to create an inclusive classroom environment that encourages participation, critical thinking, and debate. Please observe the following classroom policies: (1) Complete all required readings prior to seminar, (2) arrive on time, and (3) use electronic devices responsibly.

Communication

The best place to raise questions about readings, lectures, or assignments is in class, seminar, or office hours. Please restrict emails to (1) notifications about absences and (2) personal emergencies.
